Open Letter on the Corinth Theft

From the Director of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens.

This very rare Early Severe Style marble Kouros Head survived the destruction of Ancient Corinth by the Romans in 146 B.C. Stolen.

In the pre-dawn hours of Thursday, April 12, 1990, a day before Good Friday, a small gang of three or four persons broke into the Archaeological Museum of Ancient Corinth and stole a total of 271 objects from the museum's Greek and Roman rooms. These objects are published in this special issue, and it is hoped that its prompt publication and distribution will lead to their speedy recovery.

The robbing of antiquities is perhaps one of the worst thefts that can be committed, since it deprives a country of its heritage, but surprisingly, the penalties are light. During the past five years in Greece, there has been a trend towards organized theft, as opposed to the long-standing practice of collecting and selling antiquities by means of illicit digging. As Greece moves towards becoming a full member of the E.E.C. in 1992, it will share many of the Community's problems. Organized museum thefts is one of these, and the Corinth robbery, which is the most extensive to date in Greece, may be symptomatic of future trends.

Even though most of what was taken from Corinth may not be of great value on the art market, yet archaeologically, the objects are priceless and irreplaceable. They form an example of the history of the ancient city and of the excavations there. To put it more bluntly, Corinth has been robbed of the most illustrative examples of its history, which cannot be replaced. These objects are the result of almost a century of excavation at Corinth by the American School of Classical Studies at Athens, which began work there in 1896. The School has, therefore, deep ties with the site. Generations of American archaeologists have been trained there; indeed, practically every American archaeologist who studies in Greece today has worked at Corinth at some time or other.

The School deplores the loss that the robbery has caused to the scholarly world and to all those people who have seen and enjoyed visiting the Corinth excavations and museum. The School is pleased to have been able to help the Greek government in the quick publication of the stolen objects and hopes that such prompt publication and distribution will aid in the return of the objects and be a deterrent to similar thefts in the future.

A Note on the American School of Classical Studies at Athens

The American School of Classical Studies at Athens is the largest foreign archaeological institute in Greece, serving the students and faculty of 153 colleges and universities in North America. Founded by a group of classical scholars and interested businessmen in 1881, the School is devoted to the teaching of Greek archaeology, art, history, language and literature, as well as the excavation of Greek archaeological sites and the publication of its results.

The School is recognized by the Greek government as the permanent American archaeological presence in Greece, and serves as the official link between American scholars and the Archaeological Service of the Greek Ministry of Culture. Under Greek law, the School is broadly responsible for all American excavations in the country—assigning and supervising work conducted under permits issued by the Greek authorities.

The site at Ancient Corinth is the School's longest continuous excavation, dating from 1896. In order to provide for the proper conservation and display of its Corinthian finds, the School constructed the Corinth Museum in 1931 presenting it to the Greek government, which is responsible for its administration. The School's facilities at Corinth include a research library, conservation and research facilities, and living quarters for students and scholars.

Theft at Ancient Corinth

Antiquities Thieves turn to Museum Collections

On Thursday, April 12, 1990, just two days before the Easter celebrations, as hundreds of thousands of Greeks had begun to scatter across the country to islands and villages, creating congestion on roadways and at ports and airports, the Archaeological Museum of Ancient Corinth was robbed in a nighttime break-in believed to be the largest theft of antiquities in Greece.

At 3 a.m. several persons attacked the single night watchman leaving him beaten, bound, and gagged. They climbed onto the roof by means of a ladder and entered the building through its central courtyard. The same ladder served them as they descended from the roof into the one-level museum where they proceeded to "clean out" the exhibition hall containing ceramics.

The unfortunate 62-year-old night watchman, Theofanis Kakouris, said from his hospital bed that two of the men wore hoods, that they spoke Greek and used walkie-talkies to communicate with unseen accomplices.

The gang, burdened with their loot and unsuccessful at forcing open the heavy metal front door of the museum from within, abandoned some tools nearby and left through the courtyard, climbing onto the roof, and escaped. When the guard arrived for the 7 a.m. shift and discovered his unlucky colleague, the authorities were immediately notified, border guards were alerted, and a huge nationwide search for the perpetrators began.

Newspaper reports said that the ladder used in the gang's brazen raid had been bought in Corinth several days earlier and was left behind, covered with fingerprints. Experts speculated that the thieves may have been amateurs or even locals who knew how vulnerable the museum was. Along with the antiquities, the burglars also took one million drachmas (about $6250.00) in cash, representing a fortnight's staff wages and the entrance fees from foreign visitors.

Although connoisseurs might regard much of the haul as of only mediocre artistic quality, a large number of ceramic objects stolen were of irreplaceable archaeological and scholarly value. At final count, 271 objects were taken, including much characteristic Corinthian pottery, Geometric, Archaic, Attic Black-Figure and Red-Figure pottery, reliefs, sculptures (some from Corinth's Roman period), as well as glass vases and small finds. An Early Severe Style Archaic head of a Kouros dating from about 470 B.C. was the oldest marble sculpture stolen. Every object taken was a documented find from an archaeological dig that began in 1896 and continues to this day.

In his "Open Letter" (above) Professor Coulsen explains the connection of generations of archaeologists who have trained at the American School of Classical Studies at Athens.

The local police forces began the inquiry at once, and specialists from the antiquities squad of the security task force of the Attica police traveled south to Corinth to make a record of the stolen pieces. Fortunately, all the objects had been photographed and properly recorded, which will aid the authorities both in Greece and abroad. Each piece is marked indelibly to identify it, and almost all have appeared in one or more of the scholarly publications listed at the end of this article.

The Greek newspaper Kathimerini reported the day after the theft that in 1988 the Police Department of Corinth had sent written notification to the National Antiquities Board (Eforia Archaiotiton) that the museum was not adequately protected. A year later the Corinth police received an "answer" from the Board asking what measures it could undertake to secure the museum. An immediate reply sent earlier this year recommended the adoption of a basic alarm system.

The Ministry of Culture, under its newly appointed head, Tzannis Tzannetakis, issued a statement that the Ministry intends to reinforce museum security. Mr. Tzannetakis asked authorities at each location to review their needs. As a rule, smaller museums in Greece have few security guards during hours of opening and just one watchman at night; electronic alarm systems are rare. Skeptics have been quick to challenge the Ministry to activate those alarm systems that do exist to test which ones would actually work and to evaluate the reponse of the police.

Newspaper accounts claim that the Ministry has not responded to the reviews of needs that have already been provided, and some say that only 245 night watchmen are working in 270 museums and archaeological sites. Reports also claim that there are 300 unfilled job openings for guards and night watchmen at museums and at archaeological sites. These jobs carry very low salaries.

Art theft reporting from Greek authorities to Interpol and other international agencies is almost non-existent. But in the wake of the Corinth theft, Greek newspapers claimed that 1989 saw so many incidents that it could be characterized as the year of Greek antiquities thefts. They say the black market for ancient items has seen a surge in both quantity and quality. To the regular rhythm of scattered antiquities thefts and raids on sites that had hovered at about 70 documented incidents a year from 1976-1986 was now added hundreds of items stolen from museums.

This dramatic increase is seen, newspaper reports say, in some 231 museum thefts, small and large, in the last six months. After the incident at Corinth, the Greek newspapers showed intensified interest in reporting on the growing problem. The situation may have been privately acknowledged for many years by specialists, but now it has made the front pages.

The most important theft besides Corinth was probably that at the Museum of Rhodes on November 5, 1989. As at Corinth, thieves broke into the museum, entering over the roof during the night. In Rhodes the guard was also wounded and tied up.

A definitive list of the items taken in the November Rhodes theft only reached the Ministry's office around six months later. As reported in The News (Ta Nea), it consisted mostly of gold jewelry from the Mycenaean period. Among the 84 pieces taken were: 8 bronze statuettes, 11 clay sculptural anthropomorphic vessels, 1 Cypriot wineskin in the form of a bird, 6 pieces of gold jewelry of the classical period, 29 rose-form jewelry fragments, some of gold, 2 sword handles and 3 gold rings.

Both of these cases remain unresolved, as are the other lesser-known and less publicized thefts of recent months. It is not known how quickly or slowly local museum officials report to the Museum Section of the Ministry or how the Ministry copes with the reports that do come in. The public would not know of them except for reports in the press following the Corinth theft. The Museum Section, with a bare minimum of resources at its disposal, must deal with many problems besides theft and also has responsibility for archaeological sites and religious buildings.

Reports on the number of art and antiquities thefts and their resolution have been inconsistent. Statistics for 1989, as published in a national daily The News (Ta Nea) on May 11, 1990 show 33 cases of thefts of icons and sacred objects, of which 3 were resolved; 14 cases of thefts of antiquities of which 4 were resolved; 61 cases of illegal excavations of which 9 were resolved. "Resolved," in this context, means the authorities understand the circumstances but have not necessarily recovered the stolen items. In addition, there are said to be many cases of illegal possession of antiquities, icons, et cetera. Antiquities in Greece are so numerous that many are unrecorded, and if they are stolen and smuggled out of the country (usually by sea routes since the country has 15,000 kilometers of coastline), it may not be realized that they are missing.

The cost of the necessary security modernization is more than the Ministry of Culture's budget could possibly bear during these times of austerity in Greece. A new suggestion that has surfaced is the use of armed forces to guard Greece's museums, an economical solution already adopted by countries such as Egypt and Turkey.

Most of Greece's museums were built in an era that did not anticipate theft. The security "system" at the Archaeological Museum of Ancient Corinth is not uncommon, and the theft makes all museum officials in Greece realize their vulnerability and the need to press hard for improvements.
